Early prediction of mortality in pediatric trauma can guide resuscitation and improve outcome. We sought to develop and validate a novel risk-scoring system for use in injured pediatric patients. Data from the Pediatric Trauma Quality Improvement Program database for the period 2007 to 2014 were analyzed. Trauma registrars prospectively reported demographic and physiologic variables for pediatric patients admitted to hospitals participating in the National Emergency X-Radiography Utilization Study (NEXUS) registry. Risk scores (median [range] total number of points: 38 [0-18]) were generated using a logistic regression with stepwise selection. The prognostic utility of the risk-scoring system was validated using the validation cohort. A total of 8,530 injured children were included in the development cohort, and 6,692 were included in the validation cohort. Risk-scoring was positively associated with mortality (development cohort odds ratio: 1.52 [1.10-2.09], validation cohort odds ratio: 1.62 [1.17-2.25]), similar to existing validated pediatric injury severity score (median [range] risk score: 5.3 [0-18], mortality 8.4% [0-52.6%]). High-risk scores ( $\geq 9$  points) were a significant predictor of mortality with sensitivity of 0.85 (95% confidence interval: 0.78-0.91) and specificity of 0.91 (95% confidence interval: 0.89-0.93). Risk-scoring using multivariable regression and validated among a large, representative sample of children with trauma demonstrated a positive association with mortality, similar to the established pediatric injury severity score (greater than 6 points). A risk-scoring system provides a simple, easy-to-use tool that may be useful in prioritizing resource allocation in the pediatric trauma population. In Season 2 of Syfy's "Defiance" there is a brief scene where there is a conversation between two human characters that takes place after the show's alien invasion has concluded. The conversation goes like this 3da54e8ca3
