A 34-year-old man presented with progressive and severe heart failure. Preceding infection with enterovirus was highly suspected, but this was not confirmed. Rapid recovery of heart function was achieved after discontinuation of anti-infective therapy. Cardiac catheterization showed significant coronary artery obstruction. During the initial inotropic therapy, the patient developed severe hyponatremia and onset of syndrome of inappropriate ADH secretion was suspected. Plasma ADH and urinary osmolality both returned to normal after anti-infective therapy was resumed. The patient gradually recovered from heart failure, inotropic support was discontinued and transthoracic echocardiography showed no evidence of myocardial dysfunction. It was hypothesized that fulminant myocarditis might be complicated by syndrome of inappropriate ADH secretion. This case illustrates the development of cardiac failure and urgent coronary revascularization as a result of myocarditis, and the dramatic restoration of cardiac function in the presence of inappropriate ADH secretion and hyponatremia. interest in this work.
