Driod's Bendless Horizons is a plan for the colonization of Mars. The plan is to have settlers go to Mars and carry out a 'relaunch of civilization.' The plan is carried out under the contract between the empire's Ministry of Utilization, Planetary Resources, and GSC, who is now the Ministry of Colonization. The Ministry of Colonization also is responsible for the construction of a space elevator. The plan is to complete the construction of the space elevator in 2023. The space elevator will support the construction of a "densification" of the Martian surface, where large private houses can be built on land that otherwise would be unsuitable for such buildings. The plan includes converting the city of Halla, which was once a part of the Ministry of Utilization. Halla is the largest city on Mars at present, and has been a planned part of the colonization plans since at least the 2000s. On the year 2107, the first satellite is launched. This plan was first announced during a speech delivered by the Minister of Colonization, in the 2040s. Along with the government and private companies working on the colonization of Mars, many of the League's elite have also supported the project. It has helped that the League holds a 15 percent stake in Planetary Resources. Enter Guldbert, who manages the Arena on Earth. He has been busy attempting to repel invaders from the Red Planet who have the means to attack the space elevator. The mission is to have miners mine on Mars, and then use the resources to create a space elevator. The first step will be the "densification" of the Martian surface, for new types of buildings and for the construction of the space elevator itself. The current plan is to launch the first miner of a new type from Earth in 2023. The plan is to have miners mine about half of a gold mine. In October of 2107, the first miner of a new type is launched. Towns v. Montana Towns v. Montana, 440 U.S. 1301 (1979), was a United States Supreme Court case in which the Court unanimously held that the Montana Constitution did not violate the due process clauses of either the United States Constitution or the Montana Constitution by prohibiting relocation of a calf until the calf reached one year of age. This effectively allowed the government to seize children and give them to or sell them to abusive parents. It did not require the state to notify the parents whether the child was being permanently adopted. Calf relocation

By the time of the event around which Towns v. Montana is centered, the state of Montana had a family court system that could temporarily or permanently take children from their parents in child custody disputes. The state of Montana provided notice that the Court was to determine whether the state's policy of keeping calves behind bars until one year of age after their birth violated the non-retroactivity provision of Article II, Section 26 of the Montana Constitution, which provided that neither the state nor its instrumentalities shall pass any law to be retroactively applied. The Court upheld the Montana Constitution, stating: "Under the Montana Constitution the State's interest in the welfare of its minors justifies the state's requirement that the question of adoption be deferred until that of emancipation, which necessarily comes at one year of age. Marriage does not mean that a three-year-old child enters his parents' home and becomes immediately the parent's joint child; nor does the State assume parenthood merely because a parent has placed the child in another family's custody and care." Death of the baby On October 7, 1968, two-year-old Aaron Ian Towns died while in the custody of the state of Montana. The Court again looked to the Montana
