In a number of applications, it is necessary to operate a number of speakers at a plurality of locations in a limited area, such as the limited area of a vehicle's dashboard, or a single area, such as a partial area of an automobile's windshield. The problem arises that the sounds radiated from the speakers have to be individually controlled in a way that the correct sound is heard at the correct position and not at any other position in the same area. To achieve this, it is known to provide the speakers with individual phase-control regulators that adjust the speakers' phases relative to the reproduced signals, to the extent that the correct sound is heard at the correct position and not at any other position in the same area. An audio loudspeaker is described in the DE-GM No. 92 02 054. This audio loudspeaker contains an arrangement for adjusting the phase of the loudspeaker, wherein there is provided a cabinet in which the loudspeaker is mounted and is sound-radiatingly connected to an amplifier stage. The cabinet is subdivided into a first and second half and the first half of the cabinet is formed of a sound-insulating plate and the second half of the cabinet is formed of a
