New Player Intelligence system (FUT 20) General: EA SPORTS FIFA 20 had a revolutionary AI system, which learns from player behaviour and game flow to improve its prediction of player decisions and predict how players will likely act in the future. FIFA 22 continues the development of this system and improves the accuracy of the decisions made by AI teammates, as well as the determination of the appropriate actions to take. The new AI system is based on motion capture (motion-based player intelligence) and machine learning (ML). Players in motion-based mode are simulated as purely physical beings, while in ML mode they are simulated to be thinking, rational creatures based on decision-making. This means that when playing against a player using the AI system, there is no cognitive bias in which way the player is reacting to the situation at hand. Decisions made by each player's AI teammates will be based on the physical data they received from their own motion capture systems. The AI players will have different personalities as well, and thus the most important aspect of the new AI system is not the sportspersons, but the unpredictability of its decisions. The performance and types of actions a player will perform are also affected by the difficulty of the match (e.g. high-intensity 5v5 game vs a lower-intensity 4v4 game). If a player has a player type (e.g. goal threat, target, workhorse, space eater) that is different from their personality, these decisions are made in relation to the player's personality and in accordance with the type of player he is. There are also a number of decisions based on the player's behaviour, such as if he is dribbling the ball or not, the difficulty of the pass, the advantage the player needs to get to the ball etc. If the AI player is receiving the ball, he will perform the 'usual' actions, while if the AI player is on the defensive line the player is usually less predictable. The AI player is more influenced by the player's behavior, since he follows the player at all times and thus he can see that action and decide how to react. If a player makes a slight decision error (e.g. pulls the ball back at the wrong time), the AI team mates will automatically correct this. If a player makes an error of greater magnitude (e.g. makes an unnecessary pass), the AI teammates will directly come to the player's defence. This

I think EA didn't have a lot to do with the title. A professional soccer game on the PC couldn't have much responsibility, really. In any case, this is one of my favorite games of all time. My favorite ever, next to Total Football. It's really like a sequel to that. EA is probably responsible for some of the infrastructure, especially the inter-game communications. Probably a few servers. In any case, I feel like it's fundamentally different. The single most important thing is the training tools, and particularly the videos. It's still the same beautiful game on the face of it, but it's now something I can interact with in a deeply meaningful way, and I don't even have to pick it up. I'm being shown how to do it. But there are no longer these weird blind spots on the pitch. Sometimes I can't see a player when the ball drops between
