While some of the players who have been signed up for the Tour of Britain have been seen running and training on the roads, one of the most striking images in recent memory has been of Paul Gojo on his bike in his fluffy pink coat. This is because Gojo, a Muslim man from Jamaica, has decided to wear his new cycling kit in a gesture of peace. In a video released by Gojo himself, he explains that even though his religion prohibits him from taking part in some exercises, such as the wearing of certain types of clothing, he has decided to wear his kit "as a gesture of peace, love and respect" for his fellow man. He notes that even though he is Jamaican, he has a small British accent and so it would be easy for them to mispronounce his name and think he is British. He also notes that the cycling gear will in no way reduce his ability to ride fast or efficiently - he is merely reinforcing his message of peace and love. "I have approached the event organisers and asked to do this, so that we can both be sporting our respective faiths in the eyes of the public in the best way possible," he explained. "I have seen all the cyclists lined up in these jerseys and I am excited to see the response of the British public as they take notice of my message. I am sure there will be quite a number of people who are opposed to my request, but I am sure there will also be a number of people who will appreciate a gesture of peace and respect. This is a chance for you all to engage with me, and think about what you might be able to do to implement that gesture in your lives." Gojo even has a hashtag to help the public spread his message, #PrayersPaved the Road. Those who have been following Gojo's YouTube account have seen videos showing him training for the Tour of Britain and explaining what his message is about. They include a short video in which he explains what he is doing and some yoga exercises, as well as clips of training rides, interviews, and footage from the Tour of Britain to explain what it is like. All of his public posts
