Floor matting is useful in a variety of applications such as, for example, to reinforce or support flooring structures such as subfloors, to secure insulation against flooring structures, and to prevent scuffing of floor coverings such as carpet, wood, and tile. One conventional method of producing floor matting employs a hand-formed process whereby an adhesive is applied to one face of a mat of fiberglass, and the mat is then rolled or otherwise laid out on a table. A roller or smoothing iron is then used to smooth out the surface of the matting, and thereafter the mat is given a backing of vinyl or other suitable material. This process is inherently labor intensive, and is prone to operator error. Additionally, the rollers and smoothing irons used in this process are relatively expensive, as well as subject to deterioration and breakage. In view of the problems and drawbacks associated with conventional methods of producing floor matting, there is a need for an improved process of manufacturing floor matting. Cloning and characterization of mouse chemokine homologues in the tissues and cells. We characterized mouse CCR2 (mCCR2), CXCR2 (mCXCR2), and CXCR4 (mCXCR4) genes by nucleotide sequence analyses of mouse genomic DNA and found that these chemokine receptor genes are homologous to human chemokine receptors. Sequences of mCCR2, mCXCR2, and mCXCR4 cDNA clones showed approximately 90%, 72%, and 64% homology to human CCR2, CXCR2, and CXCR4, respectively. However, there are notable differences in the 5'-noncoding regions among them. The mCCR2, mCXCR2, and mCXCR4 genes are organized in the same way as human counterparts with a total of five exons, three of which encode extracellular portions of the chemokine receptor.

mCCR2, mCXCR2, and mCXCR4 are most abundantly expressed in thymus, lungs, and lymph nodes, while relatively low levels of mCCR2 and mCXCR2 are also expressed in spleen, liver, and heart.
