Intestinal absorption of norepinephrine, epinephrine, and dopamine, catecholamines which are important hormones, is an important factor for the normal homeostasis. During the intestinal absorption process of catecholamines, some catecholamine-metabolizing enzymes such as catechol-O-methyltransferase (COMT) and monoamine oxidase (MAO) are activated, and their activities are changed by drugs. Therefore, we examined intestinal absorption and metabolism of catecholamines by salicylic acid. We investigated the effects of salicylic acid on the uptake of norepinephrine, epinephrine, and dopamine by everted small intestine of guinea pig. Salicylic acid inhibited the uptake of catecholamines by everted small intestine dose-dependently. MAO inhibition by salicylic acid was also confirmed in the reaction mixture of the incubation of norepinephrine with intestinal contents. These results indicate that salicylic acid inhibited the intestinal absorption of catecholamines by inactivating some catecholamine-metabolizing enzymes.1.
