Adobe Photoshop CC has used the process of shutting down the Beta feature and ended the start-up crashing issues with the release version. Unfortunately, no new features were added. It is also extremely disappointing that there's no support for iPhoto's color profiles. The best workaround I found is continuing to use manually created profiles and then exporting them to a new, external folder. Hopefully a future update will rectify things for those who use iPhoto as backup. The built-in RAW converter works, but it's not good enough to compete with other software solutions. It may have gotten better, but the continual crashing even on powerful computers, and the inability to use Fujifilm X-Trans sensor RAW files have still not been addressed. The rest of the timeline and crop functions are not implemented. Again, this is a warning that the program's popular status may limit the attention to certain features. Adobe should be applauded for releasing this update, even if not all and sundry are happy about it. I use Lightroom because it serves my purposes, and it's a perfect tool for things of this nature. What can be said about Lightroom 5? Quite simply, Lightroom is the most reliable, stable, and feature-packed RAW converter around. How does it compare to Photoshop? As I reviewed Lightroom 5, the same way I review Lightroom 4: Comparatively. Add only the best features, like the new feature of three-way multi-angle blending to the process of creating panoramas.
